

Good mentorship priceless in women's careers

March 17, 2017 11:30 PM

New Wave staff newwave@tulane.edu

Mentorship is priceless when it comes to women in the workplace and Kathy N. Waller, executive vice president and chief financial officer of The Coca-Cola Company, will be on campus Tuesday, March 21, to discuss her experience with mentors and the value they bring to budding careers.

Waller's visit is part of the Alberto-Culver Women in Business Lecture Series, which brings distinguished, nationally recognized professional women to Tulane University to discuss topics pertaining to women in business.

"The students chose Kathy Waller from among many prominent women business leaders to invite as this year's speaker, and are really looking forward to her visit," said Lory Arnold, the adviser to Newcomb's Women in Business, the student organization that selects the invited lecturers. "Her track record of success speaks for itself and we can't wait to hear her insights about developing a productive relationship between mentors and mentees."

"Her track record of success speaks for itself and we can't wait to hear her insights about developing a productive relationship between mentors and mentees."

Tulane University

Lory Arnold

At the Coca-Cola Company, Waller oversees marketing and advertising, investor relations, tax, treasury, audit, accounting and controls, reporting and analysis, real estate and risk management. She received her bachelor's and MBA degrees from the University of Rochester. She is also a CPA.

The event was established by Carol L. Bernick, a 1974 alumna of Newcomb College and a member of the Board of Tulane. The lecture is free to the public and begins at 7 p.m. in the Anna Many Lounge in Caroline Richardson Hall on the uptown campus.

Like this article? Keep reading: Seven Tulane women at the top of their game