Pastors get political, Tulane researcher investigates why

March 06, 2018 2:00 PM
Mary Cross mcross3@tulane.edu

Mirya Holman, a Tulane associate professor of political science, studies political messages contained in church sermons. (Photo by Paula Burch-Celentano)

Fascinated by the intersection of faith and politics, Mirya Holman, associate professor of political science in the Tulane School of Liberal Arts, is decoding political messages contained in church sermons.

“American religion is unique,” said Holman. “I’ve done a couple of research projects looking at political and religious messages within churches and how those influence political behavior or preferences. For example, my recent work looked at messages about voting from the Catholic Church.”

For four years, Holman has collaborated with Constantine Boussalis, an assistant professor of political science in the Tulane School of Liberal Arts. This collaboration has allowed them to explore how religious messages can shape political attitudes and behaviors.

Mirya Holman's research has implications for understanding the complex relationship between religion and politics, particularly in the context of American society. By analyzing church sermons, Holman is able to uncover the subtle ways in which religious leaders can influence the political leanings of their congregation.

As Holman continues her research, she is not only contributing to the academic discourse on religion and politics but also providing insights that can be applied to policy and community initiatives. Her work serves as a reminder of the power of faith-based institutions in shaping public opinion and policy decisions.

---

Tulane University | New Orleans | 504-865-5210 | pr@tulane.edu
political science at Trinity College Dublin, and Travis Coan, a senior lecturer in quantitative political science at the University of Exeter, to assemble a massive database of approximately 140,000 sermons written by pastors.

“Evangelical churches in the U.S. are interesting in that they have become increasingly politically active over the last 40 years.”

— Mirya Holman, associate professor of political science

Holman said that the large dataset — which is primarily composed of sermons from Christian churches in the United States — provides a multitude of research opportunities, including an in-depth look within evangelical churches.

“Evangelical churches in the U.S. are interesting in that they have become increasingly politically active over the last 40 years, and we see that there’s an increasing alignment between evangelicalism and the Republican Party,” said Holman.

Holman said that her team first sought to determine how many of the pastors included in the dataset brought up political issues when addressing their congregations.

“We went through a methodologically rigorous process of identifying political terms and slang in these sermons, and we found that about 70 percent of pastors talk about political issues at some point in our dataset,” she said.

The team also noticed patterns when they studied the topics covered in the collection of sermons.

“We found that evangelicals in our dataset are more likely to talk about homosexuality and less likely to talk about the social justice set of religious political issues, like poverty, immigration and racism,” said Holman.

Holman’s team is currently working on publishing their findings.

“We think that this is important for understanding politics in the U.S. today,” she added.