Broom is the author of “The Yellow House,” a memoir about her family’s history in New Orleans, which won the 2019 National Book Award for Nonfiction. She was awarded a Whiting Foundation Creative Nonfiction Grant in 2016, and her other work has appeared in The New Yorker, The New York Times Magazine, The Oxford American, and O, The Oprah Magazine.

She will be a headliner at the inaugural New Orleans Book Festival at Tulane March 19-21 on the uptown campus.

As a staff writer at The Atlantic, Newkirk covers politics and policy, with a frequent focus on civil rights and environmental justice. He is currently working on a book “on the fates of some of the oldest black communities in the United States in the paths of climate catastrophes.” Later this year, The Atlantic will release his long-form podcast documentary about Hurricane Katrina.

Andy Horowitz, assistant professor of history at Tulane and organizer of the speaker series, along with Thomas Beller, associate professor of English, said Tulane is privileged to have Broom and Newkirk appearing on campus.

"Sarah Broom’s “The Yellow House” already stands as one of the most important books about New Orleans, and readers have only just started to reckon with its insights and provocations,” he said. “Vann Newkirk, to my mind, is one of the best journalists working today: one of his many talents is his ability to show how broad structural forces are experienced at the individual level.”
