Tulane University’s School of Professional Advancement Digital Design students were awarded an impressive combination of 29 awards on the local, district and national levels across three American Advertising Federation (AAF) competitions during the spring and summer of 2020.

The Tulane students swept the local Advertising Club of New Orleans’ awards ceremony, earning 23 awards, including gold, silver and bronze ADDY awards and a Best of Show. The group then claimed four awards at the 5-state district competition.

In the national competition, the digital design team captured two awards, competing against programs in the 7th District of the AAF comprised of Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Tennessee and southern Louisiana and other students from across the nation.
“I can’t express how proud I am to have so many of my students’ work recognized on the local, district and national levels,” said SoPA’s Digital Design Program Director Amanda Garcia, PhD. “These wins are not only incredible for our students’ development but truly an opportunity to share a piece of the SoPA community with the nation’s leading academic programs and professionals. We’ve worked hard to build a solid program that is producing award-winning designers and having the nation recognize that is truly humbling.”

The Digital Design program, which was launched two years ago under Garcia’s direction, is an innovative program in which students are creating apps, logos, branding packages, publication design, game art and animation. Students have access to technology and equipment that allows them to produce high-quality work for real brands and organizations through co-op partnerships and service-learning projects.

“I’ve always had an eye for design and an aptitude for technology, but it wasn’t until I was a student at Tulane that my professors encouraged me to consider how leaning into my own style of design could help me stand out against other designers and create a collection of work that feels distinctly my own. What my professors, classmates and I have done is truly inspiring and pushes me to want to be even better;” said digital design student Katie Stern, Tulane’s national ADDY award winner.
