

Shear study

March 27, 2018 12:00 PM Photo by Paula Burch-Celentano
newwave@tulane.edu

Rachel Johnson organizes and photographs obsidian flake tools she crafted with a large flat river rock, known as a hammer stone to anthropologists. The tools will be used to shear alpacas on her family's farm in North Carolina as part of an experimental archaeological project. Johnson hopes to compare the patterns of wear on the tools to similar tools excavated in Peru that were used to shear camelids during prehistoric times.