

Every Child Deserves a Good School

April 29, 2008 2:30 AM Alicia Duplessis
aduples@tulane.edu

It's a lofty goal—a world-class education for all New Orleans public school children. But participants at the "State of Public Education in New Orleans" forum are aiming high. Hundreds of education professionals, community leaders and school advocates attended the forum on Monday (April 28) in Dixon Hall, strategizing ways to improve New Orleans public schools.

Tulane President Scott Cowen presents opening remarks at the forum on public education on Monday (April 28) on the Tulane uptown campus. (Photos by Ryan Rivet)

Paul Pastorek, superintendent of education for the state of Louisiana, was the keynote speaker.

He said, "Our mission is to increase academic achievement for all and to eliminate the achievement gap between the races and between classes. We must prepare our students to be effective citizens in a global marketplace."

Since Hurricane Katrina upended the Orleans Parish school system in 2005, a major school rebuilding effort has been under way.

Forum participants, representing different areas of education reform, discussed what has worked and what has failed during the past three years.

One area of concern discussed at the forum is tension among various school boards and systems. Participants expressed concern that conflict between groups may be detrimental to education.

"It's not about Orleans Parish Schools or the Recovery School District: it's about every child in New Orleans," said Charlotte Matthew, principal of Benjamin Franklin Elementary School. "We need to take our barriers down and see just how we're going to make a difference in the classroom."

There currently are 80 public schools in New Orleans run by 29 different entities including the Recovery School District, the Orleans Parish School Board and 27 charter school operators. Information about the public school operators is included in a 2008 report on the state of public education in New Orleans prepared by the Scott S. Cowen Institute for Public Education Initiatives at Tulane in partnership with the Greater New Orleans Education Foundation and the New Orleans City Council Education Committee.

Matt Candler, chief executive officer of New Schools for New Orleans, participates in the forum on public education. The mission of New Schools, a nonprofit organization, is excellence in public schools to benefit every child in New Orleans.

In response to the idea of combining the different governing bodies currently heading the schools, the former principal of the New Orleans Charter Science and Mathematics High School Barbara MacPhee said, "We cannot go back to that. I like the fact that there are three systems."

MacPhee added that it is beneficial to the students that there are a number of people who provide educational services in the city.

Tulane University President Scott Cowen moderated the forum after delivering brief opening remarks. Cowen noted that he is the product of a public school system. He also reminded the audience of how far New Orleans schools have come since 2006.

"The No. 1 priority for our city?beyond our physical safety?is public education," said Cowen. "If we get that right, the potential for this city is unlimited about where it can be in the 21st century. If we do not get it right, we will revert back to the issues that we had before the storm."

The forum was sponsored by the Cowen Institute, the Institute for Public Education Initiatives, Citizens for 1 Greater New Orleans, the Urban League of New Orleans and the Business Council of Greater New Orleans and the River Region.

In addition to Matthew and MacPhee, panel participants included Matt Candler, chief executive officer of New Schools for New Orleans; Flozell Daniels, chair of the Urban League of New Orleans; and Tony Recasner, principal of Samuel J. Green Charter School.