The spring season of productions staged by the Tulane University Department of Theatre and Dance kicks off with a contemporary view of Two Gentlemen of Verona co-produced with the New Orleans Shakespeare Festival at Tulane.

Utilizing Shakespeare's recurring themes of mistaken identity and cross-dressing, director Gary Rucker updates the production, with two young women working at a fast food restaurant and an outlaw gang of wannabe vampires. Rucker says, "I'm excited to â create a show about kids being kids that will appeal to the student population at Tulane and to the patrons of the Shakespeare Festival."

Brendan Bowen performs as Launce (and Safi as Crab the Dog) in the production. Performances are today (Feb. 29) through Saturday (March 3) at 8 p.m. and Sunday (March 4) at 2 p.m. at the Lupin Theater.

Taking

on the roles of outlaws are, from left, Jesse Friedman as Valentine, along with Ofir Caspi, Dexter Rogers and Erica Badowski. The play tells the story of the friendship between Proteus and Valentine, two foolish young men with their hearts set on equally lovelorn young women, Julia and Sylvia.
