Henry St. Paul Jr. knew it would take time to earn enough credits to get a master of business administration degree when he started night classes at Tulane University.

He just never thought it would take 53 years.

Now, at the age of 81, St. Paul is set to become one of the oldest people in Tulane's history to earn an MBA. He will walk with more than 200 other students this weekend at the A.B. Freeman School of Business graduate degree ceremony.

"He has worked very hard," says Angelo DeNisi, dean of the A.B. Freeman School of Business. "I think it's great that he can do this after all these years."

St. Paul, who now lives in Pass Christian, earned his bachelor's degree in engineering at Tulane in 1946. That year, he started work at an industrial supply company that agreed to pay for night classes. As he was one credit shy of his degree, he took a break in 1955 to start his own industrial supply business with a co-worker. "When we started the business, I said that I would stay out a semester or two," St. Paul says. "Of course, the semester or two came to be about 53 years."

During that time, he and his business partner ran Service Engineering Co., a successful distributor of pumping, compressing and materials handling equipment. At its peak, the company employed 69 people in offices in New Orleans and Mobile, Ala. In 1983, he sold the venture. He also owned computer retail shops and, in later years, worked in the engineering consulting business with his son.

Last year, St. Paul contacted DeNisi to ask if it was possible to submit a thesis to earn his last credit for an MBA. DeNisi agreed, saying that St. Paul's years of experience running a successful business would give him ample material for a thesis. DeNisi will recognize St. Paul's achievement and present his diploma at Freeman's graduation ceremony scheduled for 4 p.m., Saturday, May 17 at McAlister Auditorium on Tulane's uptown campus.

What does St. Paul plan to do with his new degree? "I'll put it on my resume and hope somebody will give me a job or give me something to do," he says with a laugh. "I can't stand doing nothing."

In the meantime, he has kept his academic ambitions under wraps. He has told his wife and eight children, but he plans to surprise his friends and siblings with his new diploma after graduation.
